Something sublime for a blow torch

After two years spent toiling with a welder's torch, Martha Walker exhibits her latest steel sculpture, "Undercurrents," on display at the 440 Gallery in Brooklyn, September 6-October 14 with an opening reception September 7 from 6-9 p.m.

The artist at work

Walker uses molten metal to create forms that seem to float through space. She works over an open flame, meticulously melting and dripping steel rods to build, her sculptures, some of which are over seven feet tall.

Due to their fluid nature, the inorganic origins of the pieces are unrecognizable, and often, they are likened to aquatic or microbiological organisms. This painstaking, meditative process reveals subconscious imagery and gives her art a feeling of timelessness.
